Reflection of the week : Week 01

What did I learn this week?

This week, I gained practical experience in planning and teaching a Basic English Grammar course. I began by introducing myself and the course routine, creating a WhatsApp group for academic queries, and assessing students' reading and basic grammar levels. During the week, I taught kinds of sentences, phrases and clauses, parts of speech with a focus on nouns and pronouns, and continued reading and vocabulary practice. I also supported the Sindh University entry-test group through past-paper MCQ practice. Conducting a weekly test helped me understand how assessment can reveal students' strengths, weaknesses, and areas that need revision. I learned that students respond better when explanations are supported with simple examples, questions, reading practice, and opportunities to participate. I also improved my classroom communication, grammar teaching, time management, and ability to clarify students' confusion. Overall, the first week helped me understand that effective teaching requires preparation, observation, regular assessment, and adjustment according to students' learning needs.

What can I do differently next week?

Next week, I will make the lessons more student-centred by giving students more chances to answer questions, make their own sentences, and practise grammar individually. I will use shorter and clearer instructions, revise difficult concepts before introducing new ones, and pay closer attention to students who need extra support. I will also manage time more carefully so that grammar teaching, reading, vocabulary, and entry-test practice all receive proper attention. I will use brief activities and follow-up questions to check understanding during the lesson instead of waiting until the weekly test.
