Reflection of the week : Week 03

What did I learn this week?

This week, I continued developing my practical teaching skills through grammar lectures, reading practice, vocabulary development, revision, and assessment. At the beginning of the week, I guided students in giving a professional self-introduction in English and taught gerunds and different forms of participles, including past and perfect participles. I then introduced articles and explained their types, usage, and examples. As the week progressed, I started the topic of tenses, beginning with present, past, and future forms of the verb 'to be', followed by simple and continuous tenses. I later covered present perfect, past perfect, present perfect continuous, and past perfect continuous tenses. Along with grammar, students regularly practised reading passages and vocabulary to improve pronunciation, fluency, comprehension, and word knowledge. University of Sindh entry-test students continued intensive past-paper practice, with special revision of questions from 2013 to 2025. Before the weekly assessment, I revised the main lectures from the whole week. On Saturday, I prepared and conducted the weekly grammar test as well as the final University of Sindh entry-test practice test. The entry-test paper was intentionally challenging and based largely on past-paper questions, and I spent about one hour preparing it. Students' overall performance in the grammar test was good and satisfactory. The entry-test papers will be checked in detail so that students' individual scores and common mistakes can be recorded. This week helped me understand the value of systematic revision, well-planned assessment, and continuous practice in improving students' confidence and examination readiness.

What can I do differently next week?

Next week, I will continue teaching the remaining grammar topics because the grammar course is still not complete. I will maintain a strong focus on grammar because students preparing for other university entry tests will also need a solid command of grammar. Along with grammar lectures, I will continue regular vocabulary practice and passage reading so that students can improve their word knowledge, comprehension, pronunciation, and overall English proficiency. I will also identify repeated mistakes from the recent tests and use them to guide further practice. The aim for the coming week will be to strengthen students' basic English skills through consistent grammar instruction, vocabulary building, reading practice, and targeted correction for their continued improvement.
