Reflection of the week : Week 04 (Final Week)

What did I learn this week?

During the fourth and final week of my internship at Atom Academy Hyderabad, I continued developing my teaching skills through grammar lectures, reading and vocabulary practice, homework checking, and assessment. On Monday, I taught modal verbs and their use in translation, discussed the previous University of Sindh entry-test results, and encouraged students by recognising their satisfactory performance. I also practised self-introduction with them. It was particularly encouraging to observe that students can now introduce themselves in English confidently and in a well-organised manner.

On Tuesday and Wednesday, I taught active and passive voice, completed the remaining rules, and checked the students' homework to identify and correct errors. On Thursday, I introduced narration (reported speech) through a detailed grammar lecture. On Friday, I completed narration, introduced question tags, and reviewed the assigned homework. Reading passages and vocabulary practice remained regular activities throughout the week, helping students work on fluency, pronunciation, comprehension, and word knowledge. On Thursday, I also attended a separate one-hour university guidance session about the e-portfolio, where I received feedback and clarification about internship documentation.

This week helped me connect my Applied Linguistics studies with practical teaching. I used elements of Communicative Language Teaching through self-introduction and spoken responses, and task-based learning through translation activities, sentence transformation, reading tasks, and homework exercises. I used scaffolding by moving from clear explanations and examples to guided practice, and formative assessment by checking homework, discussing test errors, and giving corrective feedback. Teaching modal verbs through translation also showed me how linking grammar to familiar language use can support understanding. These activities improved my lesson delivery, questioning, explanation, observation, and assessment skills.

On Saturday, the final day of my internship, I conducted a challenging grand test covering the grammar topics taught during the course. Students' overall performance was satisfactory. Looking back on the internship, I am pleased with the progress students made, particularly in their ability to introduce themselves, participate in English activities, and apply grammar concepts. This experience strengthened my confidence as a trainee teacher and helped me understand the importance of continuous practice, learner participation, supportive feedback, and practical application of linguistic teaching principles.
